Not illustrated. 1864 Excerpt: ...the necessity for science has not been so much felt, because, from its great wealth of materials, and from its industry having existed for, I may say, centuries in full development, Englishmen have not needed it, and they have been able to import skill from every other country whenever they have required it. England was the field for scientific skill to come to: in Ireland, on the contrary, we have no acquired skill; the little that did exist in the country has nearly vanished out of it. I think I could show that something like 50 branches of industry have disappeared since 1807 or 1808. There is only one way, therefore, of developing in Ireland that acquired skill which is possessed in England and Scotland, and that is by bringing to bear upon its industry that scientific instruction which, has been found so beneficial in France and Germany. 3257. Mr. Waldron Could you put in a re-jy, j?. turn of those trades?--(The same was handed in. Sullivan,--Vide Appendix.) Ph.d., 3258. Chairman. Do you think lhat the sci-M.r.i.a. entific teaching that is given abroad has been the means of creating trades where trades did not 9 June 1864. previously exist?--There cannot be the slightest doubt of it, especially with respect to France. 3259. It lias actually brought into operation certain branches of trade which were not previously in existence?--Yes; or if it has not brought into operation trades that did not exist in some form, it has developed them immensely. 3260. Do you think that the industrial education which you contemplate would be the means of reviving in Ireland any of those extinct trades to which you have alluded?--I am quite certain it would. 3261. The argument of Mr. Lowe, in his letter of May 1863, goes to the full extent, does not it, that the mi...
