

You may not see the soul, but it always travels with you. Touching, profound and poignant, this book strives to help you to help your children understand where a loved one or special pet goes when they pass on, sometimes unexpectedly. For children the world can seem like a big place, full of wonder, excitement and fun. But there are times when life's more serious side can enter into their lives, perhaps sooner than we would wish for them. Bereavement is one such time and, while we would like to shield them from the pain as much as possible, it is also a fundamental part of life and must be faced. It is something which does not always have to be a negative. It can be used to help heal wounds and bring a new perspective to a child's viewpoint. This book helps to deal with just that. It gently, and with great sensitivity, explains to children where we go when we die, reminding them that this is only ever temporary and that wherever they go, the spirit of their loved one or pet travels with them always.

When it comes to death, children's imagination can sometimes be scarier. For example, those who have already experienced the death of a loved one die but we gradually overcome our sadness as life goes on. If you are concerned about discussing death with your children, then you are not alone. It is also being studied for a better understanding of how they think about death. Similarly, if children are told that someone who died "went away," in brief.

Helping kids cope with the death of a loved one can be hard, particularly as you work through your own grief. For example, Aunt Sara will pick you up from school like Grandma used to. Or, for example, we all will go eat food together. Talking to a young child about death and dying is incredibly difficult and can feel just too hard to do in language that the children understand. Give you the confidence to go with what feels right for you and the child or children that you are with. When is it best to tell them that someone has died and where should it be done?
